Mike Winder called the meeting to order. He said the city worked with the community through various capacities, including faith-based organizations. Winder introduced Mayor Jeff Silvestrini to the group.

Michael Bourne offered a prayer.

Mayor Silvestrini noted it had been almost six years since the city incorporated. He acknowledged the Millcreek Promise Program. The program made promises to the community on education, health, and safety. The city was playing a role in housing homeless individuals with the temporary overflow shelter on 3300 S. and looking for ways to help prevent homelessness. He mentioned that the Promise Program worked with Millcreek Elementary, and programming would continue should that school close. The city partnered with the county on a grant for an after school program there. The Holladay Hills Apartments had troubles with gangs and the city had worked with the area ward in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints to assist. The city helped start an after school program for the kids there. He acknowledged the food pantries at Millcreek Elementary and Moss Elementary. The city was trying to build community and bridge divides with social programs.

The mayor said the state had been the fastest growing state in the country for the last 10 years; eighty percent of the population of Utah lived along the Wasatch Front. He appreciated that because it enriched the community with new members, but with that growth, came challenges with housing. The city was trying to shape housing developments that best served the community. The extra housing was necessary to house the growing population. He hoped to maintain communities where residents' posterity could live. The city was trying to accommodate the growth where feasible, particularly near transit, and preserve the great neighborhoods. The state was looking to improve transit options. The mayor highlighted the new Millcreek Common, which was sitting on fault line. He gave a brief overview of the plaza and new city hall which was currently under construction. In closing, the mayor wished to work with the religious leaders in the future.
